RHODODENDRON SPECIES

FALL 1932 & SPRING 1933

Among the wealth of plant material that has come to us from the Orient and which continues to arrive as plant explorers constantly introduce new species or new varieties of species already known there is no group with such abundance of flowers, variety of color, difference in stature and adaptability to various locations as the rhododendrons.

In Great Britain and Europe they are being grown in ever increasing numbers and in the past two or three decades no other class of ornamental shrubs has kept pace with their growing popularity.

In the U. S. a few trials of these plants have been made and have progressed far enough to ascertain something of their hardiness and adaptability to our conditions.

Our eastern States can grow a few of them but the west coast with its cool summers and mild winters should prove acceptable to most or all of the sorts that can be grown out of doors in Britain. We are trying out a number of these rhododendrons and offer the following list of surplus seedlings without any guarantee as to their hardiness or adaptability except that the species which are apparently hardy here are noted. Others may be hardy but we have not had them under trial long enough to so state.

As the plants we offer are in most instances surplus plants from our own trials many of them are limited in quantity and we cannot undertake to furnish plants when our present stock is exhausted as we know no available source of supply.
